LOCAL TECHNOLOGY COMPANY MAKES IMPACT AT WORLD HEALTH CARE CONGRESS

Wellness Integrated Network and its innovative product were favorably received at the recent World Health Care Congress in Washington, D.C. The local pre-seed technology company generated significant interest from numerous national corporations looking to pilot the program. Several meetings have been set with potential pilot sponsors.

Representatives from WIN attended the conference at the end of April. Company founder, Andrea Trgovcich of Boardman, secured meetings with several high-profile corporate executives in order to introduce the company and its patent-pending technology. Andrea stated, "We knew that our product was unique. The response we received from these major participants in the health care industry confirmed that our program could significantly impact the direction of wellness plans in America".

Wellness Integrated Network is a program designed to track and monitor nutritional information of individuals and families. They can then use this information at point-of-sale locations, such as grocery stores and restaurants, to make consumer choices easier and more efficient. It provides a web-based solution to the escalating health-care crisis in our country by giving consumers an invaluable tool to maintain long-term health for themselves and their families. Talks are underway to secure partners that will allow WIN to implement the program nationwide.
